

Emotional Robots: A Question of Existence* by Alex Zohar, Greg Fass, and Jake Richardson, illustrated by Alex Zohar

When I saw this on the new YA shelf, I had high hopes for a funny, quick read. In this graphic novel humans create robots, robots replace humans and then create new, better robots, and those new robots replace the old robots. And while the art is interesting, with lots of pop culture imagery, the book itself was really lacking. I feel like the authors didn't commit to it either being funny or serious, and it's this weird middle ground which doesn't really work. So it's worth looking at for the art, but otherwise I think I'd pass.
